Introduction

Getting tax compliance right is important. The first step is understanding where your business has nexus, or where you need to collect and remit sales and use tax. Nexus is ever-changing and it can be confusing for even savvy professionals.

Once your business has nexus with a state or local jurisdiction such as a county or city, you must adhere to that taxing authority's rules including collecting and remitting sales and use tax on products and services you sell. Use tax responsibilities come into play when taxable products or services are purchased without sales tax. The buyer must pay use tax to the jurisdiction where the item is used or stored. Read our 5 steps to managing sales tax guide to better understand your obligations and how to stay compliant.

Unfortunately, you can't just figure out where you have nexus today and forget about it – you have to closely monitor changes to nexus. Many activities can trigger new tax collection obligations for your business, especially now that every state has passed laws targeting remote sales and use tax revenue and online marketplace sales.

It's been a while since the 2018 U.S. Supreme Court decision, South Dakota v. Wayfair, Inc., led to economic nexus laws in every state with sales tax. Many companies still have a lot to understand about nexus and how it's established from state to state. According to a 2023 survey by Censuswide, about 55% of respondents can explain all their online sales tax obligations to someone outside their organization. More than 71% of respondents agree or strongly agree that online sales tax requirements including economic nexus and marketplace facilitator laws are complex and confusing.

Sales and use tax nexus is something that's generally associated with the United States, and it affects all companies that wish to sell into the U.S. For international companies looking to expand their businesses stateside, it's imperative that they understand nexus to maintain sales tax compliance. Furthermore, businesses that sell internationally can trigger the need to collect and remit customs duties and import/export taxes in other countries. Our 5 steps to managing VAT guide is a good starting point for understanding your obligations if you sell into places like Australia, the EU, India, or the U.K.

Your company may also have excise tax nexus or income tax nexus. The factors that trigger these obligations are different. For example, a company can have an obligation to collect and remit sales tax in a state where it has no income tax liability. Confounding, but true. And while sales tax is typically paid directly by consumers, excise tax is generally paid by businesses on sales and sales-related activities on certain products like alcohol, gas, or tobacco. Like sales tax, compliance rules for excise nexus can vary by state.

Failure to register in states where they have nexus is one of the top reasons businesses incur penalties from sales and use tax audits. We know understanding nexus can be tough, which is why we've developed this quick reference to help. Throughout this guide we outline what nexus is, what may trigger nexus, and how to keep up with your nexus obligations so you can stay in good standing with tax authorities.

DID YOU KNOW?

New Hampshire, Oregon, Montana, Alaska, and Delaware (also known as the NOMAD states) are the only states that don't have a general sales tax. However, some have local and county sales taxes.

What is nexus?

Nexus is the connection between a business and a taxing authority such as a state or local jurisdiction that establishes a tax obligation for the business. For example, if you have sales tax nexus in California and Texas, you must charge customers the right amount of sales tax and pay the tax you owe to those states.

What triggers nexus?

So, what exactly triggers nexus? Unfortunately, there's no one thing. Nexus has long been linked to physical presence, but even physical presence can be hard to measure. Due to the explosion of ecommerce sales and the Wayfair decision, physical presence is no longer the de facto standard for establishing nexus.

We've broken down some common activities that may establish nexus for your business.

ECONOMIC NEXUS

Economic nexus bases a tax collection obligation on economic activity alone. As a result of the Wayfair decision, economic nexus laws have been adopted by every state with a sales tax, Washington, D.C., and some jurisdictions in Alaska.

Nexus thresholds vary by state. Many states use $100,000 in taxable sales or 200 separate sales transactions as the economic nexus threshold. But some states have higher thresholds, and several states base economic nexus on sales revenue only. Alabama's threshold is $250,000 in taxable sales during the previous calendar year. In Washington, D.C., it's $100,000 in taxable sales or 200 sales transactions in the current or previous calendar year. In New York, it's $500,000 in taxable sales and 100 sales transactions during the previous four sales tax quarters. Some states include exempt sales and services in their thresholds. Economic nexus thresholds are subject to change. Several states have recently eliminated their transaction thresholds in favor of a sales-only threshold.

Because of economic nexus laws, it's important for businesses to actively monitor sales volumes in states where they're not registered. It's easy to exceed thresholds in one or more states, especially if you sell online or through multiple channels. Review our state-by-state guide to economic nexus laws for more details on specific thresholds and rules.

ALL STATES WITH SALES TAX
NOW HAVE ECONOMIC NEXUS LAWS

MARKETPLACE FACILITATOR LAWS

The rise of marketplace facilitator laws means that platforms where you sell goods or services, like Amazon, Etsy, and eBay, are now likely to collect and remit sales tax on your behalf. These laws shift the obligation to collect and remit sales tax from the seller to the platform that facilitates the sale. In most cases, the marketplace provider is required to collect and remit taxes if it meets economic nexus thresholds. Depending on the state, remote sellers should either include or exclude marketplace sales in their economic nexus threshold count. Find more details in our guide, State-by-state registration requirements for marketplace sellers.

PHYSICAL PRESENCE

As you may expect, physical presence includes brick-and-mortar locations like branches, offices, stores, and warehouses. It can also include renting or owning property – even property located at a site owned by a third party. Having remote employees or contractors in a state, even temporarily, can trigger physical nexus, as can delivering goods in your own vehicle, or storing property in a location owned by someone else, such as a fulfillment center.

Common triggers include:

REMOTE EMPLOYEES/SALES REPRESENTATIVES

States are evaluating how their tax policies should adapt to new remote work situations, which have swelled since the beginning of the COVID-19 pandemic. Nexus is typically established once your business hires an employee. The same occurs when a team member moves to another state. It can be difficult to keep up with employees moving around, a trend that could continue to be popular. If you're not paying attention, you may unknowingly trip nexus in one or more states.

Nexus can also be created if you employ salespeople in different states and if your employees or contractors conduct any work at a customer's out-of-state location, or even deliver products into another state. Colorado, for example, has stated that nexus can be established when a remote seller has employees in the state, "even if the activities of the employees are completely unrelated to the sales transaction at issue."

DID YOU KNOW?

In Texas, attendance at a single trade show may create nexus.

Fewer than

of businesses of any size that were surveyed claim to have implemented all required changes to be compliant with marketplace facilitator laws.

2023 survey by Censuswide

EVENT ATTENDANCE

Attending trade shows or other events in another state can also establish nexus with that state. State rules vary, and some states take a more aggressive stance than others. To trigger nexus in Arizona, for example, an employee or independent contractor generally has to be in the state to solicit sales or establish a market for more than two days per year.

Remember, nexus laws can change. Before July 1, 2016, attending just one trade show in Washington state could trigger nexus. Since then, attendance or participation at one trade show each year doesn't automatically establish nexus – although it could if an attendee is here to sell goods or take retail orders, or if the trade show is marketed to the general public.

STORING INVENTORY

If your business stores inventory in a warehouse in another state, you may trigger nexus. In roughly 20 states, you can establish a physical presence even when the facility is owned by another party. This commonly occurs when businesses use a fulfillment center to process orders, such as Amazon FBA.

And, unlike economic nexus, the obligation to collect sales tax starts from your first sale. To further complicate matters, a few states are trying to collect back sales taxes from marketplace sellers based on storing inventory in a marketplace facilitator's warehouse.

The fact that nexus rules vary by state – and are subject to change at any time – makes it extremely complicated to determine all the places your business needs to register, collect, and remit sales tax. Nexus may be triggered even if you and your employees or shippers don't step foot in another state. For example:

ADVERTISING

It's now easier than ever for a business based in one state to advertise to potential customers in other states. Beware: Sometimes advertising across state borders can trigger a tax collection obligation. For example, advertising in newspapers or other periodicals printed in Virginia can trigger nexus, as can advertising on billboards or posters located there. Similarly, the regular or systematic solicitation of sales through marketing channels like television, radio, magazines, mail, and more can establish sales tax nexus in Texas.

In 2021, Maryland became the first state to adopt a digital advertising tax. Maryland's law was ruled unconstitutional with an appeal pending, but that hasn't stopped other states from proposing similar laws. The new laws tax banner advertising, interstitial advertising, search engine advertising, and similar services. On the surface, it may sound simple to levy a tax whenever a person in a state views a digital ad. But since we take our smartphones everywhere, including across state lines, it may be difficult to pinpoint exactly where someone viewed the ad.

DID YOU KNOW?

Tax obligations can be established through a connection to an in-state business or individual, including online advertising.

AFFILIATE NEXUS

Nexus can be established if an out-of-state retailer is affiliated with an entity that has nexus in another state. Affiliate nexus laws have been expanded in some states to include activities by unrelated parties that help out-of-state businesses generate or maintain a market in the state.

In New York, an out-of-state seller may have affiliate nexus if it uses in-state representatives to solicit business or otherwise help it develop or maintain a market in the state.

Some states have recently repealed their affiliate nexus laws, and it can be difficult to keep up with changes. Illinois, for example, repealed its affiliate nexus law in 2019 and then reinstated it in 2020.

CLICK-THROUGH NEXUS

Under click-through nexus laws, your out-of-state business can establish a physical connection to a state through an agreement to reward a person for directly or indirectly referring potential buyers through links on a website.

Some states have recently repealed click-through nexus laws, so check with your state for the latest status. Most have a sales threshold, meaning the referrals must generate a certain amount of sales to trigger nexus.

Thresholds vary. In most states, referrals must generate more than $10,000 in taxable sales during the preceding 12 months or four quarters.

DELIVERY AND DISTRIBUTION

If you ship goods to customers by a common carrier such as the U.S. Postal Service, UPS, or FedEx, you're unlikely to trigger a sales tax obligation based on physical presence, but the sale may still count toward your economic nexus threshold in the state. Delivering products to customers in your own vehicle, however, can trigger physical nexus. An out-of-state business that sells to customers in New York and regularly uses its own vehicles for delivery has to register to collect and remit sales tax. Regular delivery means "at least 12 times a year."

Nexus becomes complicated if you use a drop shipper. With drop shipping, a retailer doesn't keep items in stock, but orders them from a third-party and has them shipped directly to the customer. As a result of economic nexus, businesses are increasingly impacted by drop shipping rules. But it's not always apparent who's responsible for collecting and remitting sales tax – the retailer, the supplier, or the drop shipper. And depending on the circumstances, retailers and drop shippers can be required to collect resale exemption certificates.

Refer to our drop shipping reference guide for help.

TRAILING NEXUS

Once you've established nexus in a state, it can linger longer than you might imagine. Nexus may continue even after you cease doing business or having a presence in a state, for a period that can last through the end of the calendar year or even longer. This is important to remember, especially if you trigger nexus through a temporary presence, like event attendance.

In Washington state, for example, a seller who stops nexus-creating activity continues to have nexus through the following calendar year.

Nexus for international sellers

Understanding tax compliance for every country where you sell your products can be challenging, especially if you're unfamiliar with local laws and languages. Thankfully, there are a few key steps that you can check off to help you remain in good standing with tax authorities.

1. Determine the local tax of where you're selling into.

2. Check if you've crossed a border during your transaction.
If you have, you must clear customs using a Harmonized System (HS) code to help identify any customs duties you may owe.

3. Get your item code and HS code to identify what you owe and where it's owed.

4. Remit tax to the appropriate authority and store your documents for future reference.

More U.K. businesses than U.S. businesses agree or strongly agree that economic nexus and marketplace facilitator laws are complex and confusing.

YOU MUST MAKE SURE YOUR BUSINESS ABIDES WITH EACH COUNTRY'S LOCAL TAX RULES AND REGULATIONS.

International businesses need to realize that there are both differences and similarities between selling in the U.S. and selling into other countries. While value-added tax (VAT), which is more common in Europe, is charged at every stage of production from manufacturing to distribution to retail, sales tax in the U.S. is paid by the customer at the final sale of a product.

As you expand globally, your business must register with the appropriate tax authorities. For companies selling in the European Union, Import One-Stop Shop (IOSS) simplifies requirements by allowing businesses to register in just one EU state to sell into all 27.

To sell in the U.S., you must separately register with each state where you have nexus. It can be difficult to do alone because every state has its own application process and form. You can save time by turning to an outside vendor to handle the paperwork and register your business in all the states where you're obligated to collect and remit sales tax.

There are also customs duties to consider if you're selling across an international border. Countries have different de minimis threshold, or values below which goods can be imported without being subject to customs duties or taxes. If your sales exceed the de minimis thresholds, you're liable for remitting the appropriate amount. Assigning the correct HS codes to your products will help you clear customs faster and avoid penalties.

In Europe, each country is a taxing jurisdiction. In comparison, there are more than 13,000 U.S. sales and use tax jurisdictions. They include states, counties, cities, and other municipalities with varying rates and rules. If you establish nexus, your business will need to calculate and collect sales and use tax, file returns, and pay tax to the appropriate jurisdiction. International sellers also have to consider U.S. sales tax exemptions and sales tax holidays, when normally taxable goods are temporarily exempt from sales and use tax.

Once registered in a jurisdiction, your business must submit returns and remit taxes. Due to the rise of e-invoicing mandates and real-time reporting, many companies will be required to issue and/or receive electronic invoices.

Automation software can simplify international tax compliance and make it easier to meet your obligations.

Excise tax nexus

Excise tax is charged on certain products such as tobacco, alcohol, and gasoline. Often, the tax is automatically added to the product's price. Like sales tax, certain business activities can trigger excise tax nexus. However, compliance regulations and state rules vary.

For example, beverage alcohol tax laws are different depending on where you ship wine. Virginia requires businesses that ship wine directly to consumers to collect excise tax and sales tax. Massachusetts imposes excise tax but not sales tax on direct wine shipments. While remote wineries don't need to register then collect and remit Florida sales tax unless they have economic nexus, they need to register for and collect and remit excise tax from the first sale.

Some communications services are also subject to excise tax nexus. The federal telephone excise tax is a 3% tax on local telecommunications services. Telephone companies collect the tax then pass it along to the Internal Revenue Service.

Hawaii was one of the first states to enforce economic nexus. The Aloha State has a general excise tax (GET) instead of sales tax. Businesses in Hawaii are required to pay GET on the gross receipts or gross income derived from their business activities in the state. Many companies pass along the tax to their customers.

How do you keep up?

If you made it this far, you know that nexus is tough.

It can be hard to understand the different types of nexus, and harder still to understand what they mean for your business. But knowing where you have nexus now, and where you could have it in the future, is crucial.

In short, getting nexus right takes a lot of time and dedicated effort. Unfortunately, if you don't give state nexus laws the attention they demand, the consequences of noncompliance can cost you even more time and money.
